ELECTRICITY IS THE KEY TO . . .

BETTER LIVING

OFTEN we talk about the good old days, before this modern mechanical age caught up with us. The days when horses and steam engines were the sole source of power in the production of agricultural products, and the nearest thing to running water was the old hand pump in the kitchen, when the milk was kept cool by lowering the container in the well, and the coal oil lamp was the chief source of light.

These were the days before electric power was made available to all rural people.

Today, electric motors power most of the stationary farm machinery, electric pumps provide water under pressure, modern refrigeration equipment for home and farm use made possible by the electric motor and modern electric lights that turn night into day indoors and out.

This is only part of the story of the Better Living that has been brought about since electricity was made available to all American families.

In Southside Virginia the Southside Electric Cooperative has been instrumental in providing this Better Living through Electricity. Who today would like to return to the living conditions of the good old days?
